NetDocuments, the leading native cloud document and email management (DMS) provider for law firms and corporate legal departments, announced that Bradley Arant Boult Cummings LLP ("Bradley"), with over 500 lawyers and nine offices will replace its on-premises DMS technology with NetDocuments modern cloud platform.

Matt Duncan, CEO of NetDocuments, stated, "When it comes to something as mission-critical as document and email management, law firms and corporate legal departments with a cloud strategy want to partner with a cloud-first provider – one that has the highest levels of confidence in the security, reliability, and scalability of its native cloud platform. It's truly exciting to see our service and company perform on our vision of becoming the trusted cloud platform in legal, attracting leading firms and corporate legal departments ready to leverage the next generation DMS for secure content management and collaboration. This continues our strong commitment to our company mission of providing customers with the highest levels of security, reliability, usability, and customer delight."

Mark Hendrick, Chief Information Officer at Bradley, added, "Our clients come first, and our underlying technology platforms must not only convey that message and deliver the highest levels of productivity, but also better enable Bradley to keep pace with the rate of technology change facing today's law firms and legal professionals. After evaluating alternatives of switching to the native cloud or implementing a hosted system, it became clear that NetDocuments is the platform to take Bradley into the future and meet our ever-evolving needs in the areas of client service, security, compliance, and competition in ways simply not achievable with a traditional on-premises or hosted on-premises system."
